Options that can reduce costs and enable feminization and transition earlier in life

One of the greatest difficulties faced by young, intense transsexuals who are certain of their need to undergo complete gender correction is the high cost of transition and the long time-period (several years) to get everything approved. The overall costs of counselling, hormones, electrolysis and surgeries is typically upto Rs 10 lakhs in India. Because of their gender condition, many younger transsexuals are unable to obtain good enough employment to save money fast enough to achieve a timely transition. Meantime, they are often doomed to watch as their bodies continue to masculinize (even if taking estrogen) which makes a successful and complete transition seem further and further out of reach. MtF transitioners born into rich families get financial support for such surgery.

Experience of Sahiba:

'If I hadn't been so fixated on penetrative sex as being the only option and hadn't been too intimidated, shamed and stigmatized by the way my AIS had been mis-managed to push for treatment then I might have had a better chance at achieving some sort of human intimacy, given my particular circumstances [virtually no vagina]. It makes me quite angry that no one encouraged me to think that way when I was younger. I wish that I'd had a chance earlier in my life to discuss this possible mindset with a psycho-sexual counsellor, since our high-tech medical system hadn't seemed able to provide me with a vagina at the time when one might have been of use to me in developing some view of myself as a sexual person, in the sense generally recognized by this society.'
